on Global Biodiversity

By any measure the world's biodiversity, its flora and fauna, is in crisis. Many thousands of species are endangered and at a special ministerial meeting in the Japanese city of Nagoya, experts and politicians will be planning a new way forward to try to halt the destruction. The Japan International Development Agency (JICA) is charged with helping developing countries and their populations and in recent years has been paying attention to the inter relationship between the globe's natural heritage and the health of local communities. It has invested some 2.4 billion dollars since the start of the new millennium in a variety of biodiversity-development projects ranging from protecting coral reefs and mangrove forests to promoting community projects and safe water programs.
